Two east side drinking saloons still display sid-fashioned inn signs, one a golden eagle, the other a golden swan. In the rear room of the Golden Swan is a stuffed white swan in a glass case. According to the information o e present proprietor the house was named in honor of the swan, one of a dozen brough to Central Park between thirty and forty years ago. The counterfeit swan of the sign is a very large bird, well carved from wood, richly gilded, and represented as swimming amid highly conventional waves. The stuffed swan is of an unusual size. By her side is a nest, with three swan's eggs, and in the same case is a stuffed cycnet.

The inn signs of New York have rapidly disappeared with the change in methods of living, and especially in the relation of the saloon keeper to the brewer. Since browers supply free of charge signs advertising their own beer, saloon keepers do not go to the expense of setting up "red lions." "rising suns." and the like to announce the presence of a drink-ing place. Even the Old Bull's Head Hotel, so long a good house, and still the resort of horse fanciers, is plastered over with brewers' signs, and its painted buil's head is incongruously associated with a Tyrolese hunter and a bit of mountain scenery. While the tendency in European cities has been toward the disappearance of all "signs" properly so-called. save in front of inns, barber shops, and a few other places, the tendency in New York has been to the preservation of business signs and disappearance of inn signs. The sign, of course, as the name implies, was originally intended to indicate to the uneducated the kind of business carried on in the house in front of which the sign appeared. With the increase of popular education the necessity of indicating a man's trade or business by means of a rebus disappeared and written signboards took the place of the painted or carved figures. In London and in rural parts of the United States, however, inns have continued to display true signs. In New York sign making still occupies a vast deal of the wood curver's time, and there are carvers in and near the French quarters who are still extremely skilful in the production of such works. An admirable gilded boar occupies a conspicuous place in front of a delicatessen shop in Sixth avenue, and perhaps the most interesting sign in town is a ship's figurehead, representing a fine, pompous, old East India merchant of clipper ship days, which stands in front of a business house opposite one of the East River wherves. A fashionable ladies' ailor in Fifth avenue displays upon his sign in bold relief the royal arms of England. Russia, and Denmark, as well as the three feathers of Albert Edward. Prince of Wales. Hard by is a saddler, who displays in gilded spien-dor the royal arms of Italy and England. The commonest signs in New York are the great gilded spectacles of the opticians. the mortar and pestle of the druggist, the gloved hand of the glover, the golden horse-shoe of the blacksmith, the arm and pestle of the gold beater, the Indian of the tobacconist, and the pole of the barber. The lastnamed probably had its origin in a popular misconception. The barber's pole originally. it is believed, was a "poil" or head, being the proper embient of the barber's business. As the word "polt" lost in popular speech its significance, the pole, with red stripes to indicate the barber's avocations of blood-letting and tooth pulling, was substituted for the head. This country is the only one in the world where the barber's pole commonly bears three colors-red, white, and blue. Any man above 35 years of age can recall the time when the blue stripe was added. The original white and red of the barber's pole happened to be the colors of the Southern Confederacy. and Northern barbers, anxious to conciliate the majority, added the blue stripe. A few border State barbers made the addition through fear of being mobbed should they display the hated colors of the Confederacy. The parti-colored pole of the barber and the red, green, and blue jars of the apothecary have appeaently become fixed as emblems of those trades. But the colored jars displayed by the apothecary are only a modification of the colored lights usual a few centuries age to point out the whereabouts of drinking places and contensioned the second of the colored second contension of the whereabouts of drinking places and contension to advertise their places in one way or another, and thus guide belated customers to the places they sought. As to the miscone-prion which gave us a note instead of a "poll" for the barber's sign, such popular billing the proof of the barber's sign, such popular billing the proof of the barber's sign, such popular billing the proof of the barber's sign, such popular billing the proof of the barber's sign, such popular billing the proof of the barber's sign, such popular billing the proof of the barber's sign, such popular billing the proof of the barber's sign, such popular billing the barber's sign barber billing the barber's barber billing billing the barber's barber billing billing the barber's barber billing billing pole and the wooden Is idian, perhaps the commonest sign in New York.

The old cio' men of New York seem content with a written sign and the exhibition of sundry garments. The sign of the London old cio' man is a rag doll, and itst origin, as explained doubtless by one of the craft, is very curious. The story is that a wom is n brought a bundle of ciothes to a second-hand dealer, but went away before they were op sned. The dealer on opening the bundle found, within a pair of diamond sarrings and a rant doll. He diligently but vainly advertised for is a customer, and at length in desperation hing the doll in front of his door. There it stayed until nearly destroyed, when he, finding it a fit emblem, got a new one. Others of the trade imitated him, and presently it became the common sign of the business.

a new one. Others of the trade imitated him, and presently it became the common sign of the business.

Signs in the French quarter, as might be expected, are often elaborately pictorial, though never so artistic as some of the famous signs of old Paris. A wins mer thant in South Fifth avenue has for a sign three or four large barrels, ranged in his windows so that the heads show, and on them are painted maked pictures of the young Bacchus. The signs of Paris in earlier times and, to some extent, even yet, were classical, historical, or romantic. Occasionally they presented a scene or character from an opera or play. Sometimes they contained a pun; sometimes they were indelicate. This century has added little originality to the art of sign making, and many of the wood carvers have gone on following old models. The sign of the leg, not uncommon with dealers in ladles hosiory, is very old. A French sign of this sort dating back to the early part of the century shows a young woman nutting on her stocking, with small care. ers in ladles' hossery, is very old. A French sign of this sort dating back to the early part of the century shows a young woman putting on her stecking, with small care as to consequence, and an obsequious, young salesman cheerfully dancing attendance. The inscription that socourpanies the sign is a double entente. Even Mr. Starin's rebus, ""in." is not now in principle, and dozens of seemingly meaningless inn signs in England are to be traced to the foudness of publicans for indicating their own names by a rebus that should appeal to even the unlettered. Thus the hare and bottle was a sign in front of a shop kept by one Harebottie; the jute and or stood for Lutor, and bottle and tun for Bolton.

There are a few ingenious and amusing signs in New York that will be valuable as curlos a century bence. One occasionally seen in restaurants and canneries represents a human face ingeniously made up of various vegetables. Nothing more claberate of the sort is to be seen anywhere in town. A cork cutter on the east sidu uses for a sign the house that Jack built, eleverly done in cork. The emblematic terra cotta fowls of Jefferson Market and the honds of various animals in the Washington Market building are excellent, and quite of the spirit of sixteenth and seventeenth century signs.

GOV. PATTISON'S PROCLAMATION.

He Urges Upon the Citizens of Pennsylvania the Necessity of Complete Santtation, HARRISBURG, Sept. 5 .- Gov. Pattison issued a proclamation to-day on the cholera situation.

AMUREMENTS.

"19 P. M." and Jennie Yeamane. The only new play with which the theatrical veek began in Broadway, last evening, was at the Bijou. It was entitled "12 P. M." and C. B. Dillingham was the author. In it Jennie Yeamans gave a curious and not uninteresting exhibition of her abilities and disabilities as a comic actress. Miss Yeamans's drollery had been familiar on our stage for many years in rôles upon which the success or failure of the play did not targely depend, and it had often seemed as though her quaintness and oddity were sufficient to constitute her a leading comedienns. Her venture at the Bijou was meant for a free test of her qualities. She was the "star" of the production, and she had a great variety of opportunities to display versatility of talent. She availed herself of all the privileges, but not always to her advantage. Within ten minutes after her first bow she had winked at some friends in a box. distracted the other actors with impromptu remarks, joked with the ushers who passed flowers over the footlights to her. and demonstrated an unruiness that astonished those not acquainted with her idiosyncrasics. These inartistic lapses and defiance of artistic method, more than her lack of power to entertain, deprived her of the moderate triumph which she might of power to entertain, deprived her of the moderate triumph which she might otherwise have gained. On the credit side of her account, however, may be set down considerable of laughable mimiery, occasional facility and experiences in carlcature, and positive success in some other songs and dances. If she had been one in a dozen capable comedians, with each of the eleven others doing as much as she did to amuse the audience, the evening would have been enjoyable; but the commany was about as bad as any that ever gets itself, by strange mischance, into a Broadway theatre.

With Mr. Dillingham's play it would be both fullle and unjust to deal critically. It was an off-hand collection of merry conceits of his own, into which somebody else ifor it cannot be that he was guilty of that had interpolated very, very old jokes. To his sure discredit, however, was the intreduction of two fortune-hunting, bogus noblemen and an impossible newspaper reporter, all charactors written as finity as they were acted. That is exceedingly severe condemnation. The main idean pretended Spiritualist frightened into honesty by a joily conspicators' scance—was fare, and all the neceptability found by the audience in "12 P.M." lay in the songs, dances, and pantomime tricks of this scene. Miss yearmans's part was that of a hoydenish girl, and her delineation was indefinite and instructions. In the secontributed freely and wot, to the nonsense of the mock scance.

A Very Unique " Labor Play,"

Harlem's new play last night was " Monongahela; or, Homestead in '92." Frank Norcross, an actor, had written to, and he had also supplied the funds for its test. But, unless Mr. Norcross is something like the bloated capitalists at whom, he has aimed his drama, his venture will have a disastrous and a florting publicity. Launched on Labor Day, with the additional element of timeliness in Es favor, it still failed to even half fill the Columbus's lower floor last night. The gallery was overcrowded, though, and much, noise issued from aloft, but not all the noise could be mistaken for enthusiasm. There were several sad ranments of derision, and there were frequent and irrelevant interruptions of the play at points intended to be deeply impressive. The truth is that Mr. Norcross's drama went far astray of its purpose. It started promisingly, but it soon lost coherency, intelligence, point, and probability, and thus it presently wandered into chaos, and bathos. and finally into downright and driveiling bosh.

and snally into downright and driveiling bosh. This play could not possibly be accepted as a plausible plea for the Homestead laborers. It was as if the author had merely strung together a series of incidents gathered at haphazard from badly informed or basely projudiced newspaper reports. These episodes, selected, of course, with an actor's natural eye to "dramatic effect," did not fill out the measure of a play, however. Hugho'Donneli was audaciously brought forward as the hero, and John E. Kellerd, who did not talk, act, or look like O'Donneli, impersonated him. He had many speeches to make, and most of them were too long. He was pictured as peaceful to the last, in favor of arbitration, and exceedingly fearful lost the Homestead mills be damaged by lawless men from other cities. With Bursess Luckie to aid him, he was on hand to receive Sheriff McCleavy and his deputies, and after an argument that was strangely at variance with his previously expressed opinions, O'Donnell ordered the Sheriff out of the town. When the Sheriff hesitated O'Donnell said he had 3,000 determined men at his back; and then about thirty supes formed in line, and, with something suspiciously resembling a lockstep, actually shoved the Sheriff off the stage and out of Homestead.

By this time the locked-out men had grown very violent. Some of them had hauled a hugo.

selected, of course, with an actor and the measure of nicky and the measure of nicky course. However, Bush Driver, Bush Dr landing that O'Donnell and his men could hurl imprecations at its Captain. Here it was clearly and valuably established who fired the first shot. It was Captae it was clearly and valuably established who fired the first shot. It was Captae item, a man with black whiskers, and a Western burt on his torgue. He grew weary of O'Donnel's logic, and shot Ital Foy. a Salvation Army worker. At that the Homestead men opened fire, and a sanguinary conflict at short range resulted in the disorderly departure of the boat. In the course of this skirnish, too, it was made very plain that the strikers were opposed to the Anarchists, for they fell upon Louis Barrett, who was east for the bomb thrower, and tore the shirt off his back, principally because it was a white shirt and a boiled. That was tough on Mr. Barrett, who is an old actor, and the brother of a dead and famous one; but he had no time to complain, because he was also the the stage manager, and he had to hurry off for the next scene.

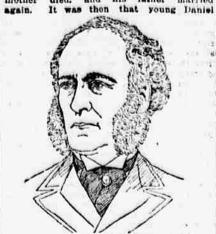

Another occasion of a wall solemnity was the distribution of the 'dentification badges' to the reporters, and, as usual in stage pletures of them, the reporters were a mightyill-layored set. The SUN was not represented among them, but the newspapers which had favored violence and had been conspicuously hysterical in treating the trouble were designated by O'Donnell to the keen delight of the gallery. Some of the reporters, it appeared, were versatile, for they afterward were recognized variously as troops, Hungarian strikers, and "links." When the play had become so involved that the author's dilemma was shared in by the auditor, the matter of the millita occurred. It seems that all the people in Homestean had longed for the soldiers from the faurt, particularly after the shooting. So a petition to the Governor had been widely signed, and tho gri who was in love with O'Donnell, but had acclined to marry him on account of her defective education, volunteered to take the partition to the fivorence. He had not be protected on the head o left home and began his struggle. His early life was a series of battles for existence. In his eighteenth year he made his real start in life by entering the law offices of William and Samuel Badger. Two years afterward he became prominent as a Democratic speechmaker, and in 1849 he was admitted to the bar. In 1859 he was the acknowledged leader of the Douglas party in Philadelphia. In the Presidential election that placed Lincoln in the White House for the first term the Douglas party in Philadelphia polled nearly 0,000 votes, which was due largely to Mr. Dougherty's earnest efforts. In the beginning of 1861 at a public meeting in Philadelphia Mr. Dougherty prepared the first resolution ever passed in favor of coercion against secession. In 1802 the Union League Club was founded, with thirty members, one of whom was Daniel Dougherty, Mr. Dougherty delivered in 1859 an address on "Fears for the Future of the Republic" before the literary societies of Lafayette College. The utterances of the orator on that occasion, prophetic as they proved, caused widespread comment all over the world, and Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton was 50 impressed by them that he quoted and commented on them in the House of Commons. When the army of the Confederacy in 1893 invasted Fennsylvania and threatened Philadelphia, the friends of secession placarded the name of Daniel Dougherty with the names of other prominent Unionists, but the patriotic orator continued his zealous work unmolested. The nomination of Tilden in 1876 brought Mr. Dougherty once more to the defence of the Democratic standard and he warmly advocated the election of his party's nominee. The same year he was nominated for Congress by the Democrats, but declined to run. The last appearance of the orator on the political platform was in 1883, when at the St. Louis Convention, in behalf of the State of New York, he nominated Grover Cleveland. The nomination was carried by acclamation by the Convention. In 1880 he had nominated Hancock for the Presidency, After 1888 Mr. Dougherty changed his place of business to New York as the associate of 1ra M. Shafer in the defence of Thos. F. Cleary, one of the boodly Roard of Aldermen of 1884, Dougherty's part of the trial, before Justice Barrett in 1887, was the plea. He spoke four and a half hours. Mr. Dougherty's claim to fame was a polished gentleman. He spoke four much of his time when in New York at the Manhattan Club. Last June Mr. Dougherty decided to return to his old home in Philadelphia, and soon after this does not reached the illness which resulted in his death. HORSE AND CARRIAGE TRADE. Manufacturers and Others Look Forward to

Not before in many years has the fall trade in the horse and carriage market set in under more favorable circumstances than at present. The cool, pleasant weather which makes driving a pleasure, together with the return of thousands of persons from the seashere and country, ought to boom the local market. Buy-ers who attended the semi-weekly sales at Van Tassell & Kearney's the past week secured some rare bargains at very low figures. The Large crowds are attracted daily to the sale of Western unbroken horses at 154th street and Eighth avenue. Quite a number of horses were disposed of last week at ridiculously low

The local horse market quotations were: First-class carriage pairs, $700 to $1.800; good drivers, $300 to $1.200; saddle horses, $300 to $1.200; saddle horses, $300 to $1.000; horses for buggles and gigs, $150 to $350; truck horses, from $150 up; good work horses for general work, $125 up; business horses for light work, $100 to $300; railroad horses, from $125 up.

Manufacturers and dealers alike in the carriage trade, in anticipation of the early fall business, have stocked their warerooms with a fine display of vehicles of all kinds.

Business during the past week was quite brisk. Hoover loberts & Co. of 63 Murray street have made sweeping reductions in all departments. This means that persons looking for good things should pay them a visit. They have a superior lot of business wagons of all descriptions.

At van Tassell & Kearney's mammoth repository, 130, 132 Fast Thirteenth street, a complete stable outfit can be purchased at very reasonable figures.

Flandrau & Co., Broadway and Fifty-first at reet, have added several new and elegant designs of victorias, cabriolets, and other heavy carriages to their immense assortment. They offer somesecond-hand vehicles at cheap prices.

Chicago's Inconsistent Suburt.

CHICAGO, Sept. 5.—The efforts of the church people of Englewood, a suburb of this city, to prevent Sunday theatrical performances have resulted in a suit for heavy damages, with the prospect that the case will be foug'at bitterly prospect that the case will be fought bitterly on both sides. Englewood has one theatra, the Marlowe Opera House. Two Sundaya ago the police, at the instigation of John J. Fenn, leader of the Sabbuttarians, prevented an advertised performance of a farce-comedy at the Opera House. Fenn has now been sued by Manager Miller of the theatra and his partner for $50,000 damages.

Mr. Miller claims that if Sunday shows are prevented he will lose the larger share of his patronage. Englewood is inside the Chicago limits, and is noted for its church scandals. Its bigotry, and murder sensations.
